Naevia wished to avoid crossing the town, so as not to attract attention, for the people would have imagined that she was flying from the place and have been needlessly alarmed. The carriage rolled swiftly away, down the highroad. The air was cool, but Naevia s face burned as if it were midsummer. In about an hour they reached the bridge over the Clanis, and a quarter of an hour later they could see the villa behind a thick grove of olivetrees. Until now the road had been absolutely deserted; but they now perceived at some distance a number of strange figures; men in dark tunics or skins, and with spears or other weapons that they had seized from the Roman soldiers. At the same instant a handful of these men appeared on the road from the right and challenged the vehicle; Naevia gave the...
